The sky builds its monument, layered and still.

A soft gate opens, where the air remembers light.

Branches whisper against a waking blue.

The veil thickens, holding its breath.

A bright window peers through, patient and wide.

Shapes drift—half memory, half mist.

Sunlight moves behind a curtain of silence.

In the calm between frames, the unseen stands watch.

Clouds roll like quiet oceans over rooftops.

Openings appear, like thoughts parting.

Every drift another brushstroke of November.

Bare branches trace the sky’s slow pulse.

Blue deepens, carrying the last whisper of form.
